Somewhere between Thomas Eisner's "For Love of Insects" and the BBC's TV show "Gardeners' World", Simon Hureau recounts in minute detail how he slowly brought his garden back to life from the wasteland that the former owner had left behind. Without any particular knowledge on the subject, the author managed to transform a no-man's land into an oasis of biodiversity thanks to a lot of research, love, and hard work. He thus proves that nature can be resilient, as long as you are willing to help it out. A fascinating book by a self-taught expert.

Born in 1977, Simon Hureau went to Strasbourg's school of Applied Art after a scientific major in high school. In 2001, he received the Second Young Talent Award at the Angoulême Festival, and won a French Crime Story Award in 2012 for his book "Intrus à l'étrange" (La Boîte à Bulles). He is the author of a dozen comic books and travelogues.

Quand on a acheté notre maison, on savait qu'on aurait du boulot : c'était plutôt laid et presque glauque. Mais on en reniflait le potentiel! Et parmi les raisons qui nous ont poussés à signer, la présence d'un grand jardin avait joué un certain rôle.

Un jardin Pans nos recherches, c'était l'un des principaux critères. Bien entendu, pour pouvoir nous le permettre, il a fallu nous éloigner de la ville.

Nous avons donc jeté notre dévolu sur un charmant bourg en bord de fleuve, loin de l'agitation stressante et de la grisaille urbaine...

Si encore il n'y avait que le cotonéaster... Mais dans le registre du hideux stérile banalisé, la palme du pire revient sans conteste au Thuya.
