It is 1947. The United States has just revealed to the world that a flying saucer has crash-landed near Roswell, New Mexico. A few hours later, Stalin declares that the USSR, too, is in possession of a spaceship. The two superpowers will throw themselves into studying the vehicles, devoting all their considerable human and financial resources to the project.

Twenty years later, in a world of flying cars and atomic-powered trains — a world that has undergone a spectacularly fast technological evolution — Nico, a young C.I.A. agent, sets off on a mission that will take her around the world. A retro-futuristic utopia is born.
