Born in Saudi Arabia, a country that offers him no future because of his Chadian nationality, Mohammed El Gorani decides to go and study in Karachi, Pakistan at the age of 14. Two months after he arrives, he is sold to the American government by the Pakistani secret services, who claim he belongs to Al-Qaida. He finds himself in the fast lane to a living hell. He is imprisoned and tortured in Afghanistan before being taken to Guantanamo, where he is subjected to routine torture and interrogation. Mohammed is one of the youngest prisoners at the camp, and one of the only black detainees. After an arduous battle lasting eight long years, Mohammed's innocence is finally recognized.

Ma famille appartient à la litibu des Goranes, des nomades qui vivent au Sahara, au Tchad. Quand mes grands-parents sont arrivés à Médine, ils ont pris ce nom comme nom de famille. Quand j'étais gamin, je ne connaissais presque rien de mes origines. Mon père m'avait seulement raconté qu'à sept ans il devait aller seul dans le désert, pendant des jours, à la recherche d'herbe pour les chameaux.
